On why FOIA should not apply to private colleges and universities:

“Congress has chosen not to radically expand FOIA. Rather, our current system allows government agencies to condition receipt of government funds on the submission of information from the recipient.”

“Once this information is reported by the institution to the government, the public may obtain it from the government agency via FOIA. This system strikes an appropriate balance between the public’s right to know how government funds are used and an institution’s legitimate interests in protecting confidential information and avoiding the significant costs that go along with responding to FOIA requests,” Nohos said.
